The Google Privacy Policy and our various product-specific privacy notices describe how we treat personal information when you use Google's products and services, including any of Google's mobile products and services. In addition, the following describes our mobile privacy practices.

For a web version of this and other Google privacy policies, please go to www.google.com/privacy.html.

Mobile-specific information we collect

- Most of the personally identifying information we collect is what you tell us about yourself. For example, certain of our products and services allow you to interact and share personal information and data with others. You choose what you want to share and how you want to share it.
- Sometimes, we record your phone number. We record your phone number when you send it to us; ask us to remember it; or make a call or send a text message or SMS to or from Google. If you ask us to remember your phone number, we will associate your phone number with your Google Account, or, if you do not have a Google Account, with some other similar account ID. We often generate this account ID based on your device and hardware IDs, so if you change your device or hardware, you will have to re-associate this new device or hardware with your account before we can authenticate you.
- We collect some information on device-level events, such as crashes, and associate that temporarily with your Google Account in order to provide customer service.
- Most of the other information we collect for mobile, such as your device and hardware IDs and device type, the request type, your carrier, your carrier user ID, the content of your request, and basic usage stats about your device and use of Google's products and services does not by itself identify you to Google, though it may be unique or consist of or contain information that you consider personal. However, if you use an Android-powered device, Google will associate your device id with your Google Account in order to provide services, such as sync functionality for your Google email and contacts.
- Certain information, including information you may consider personal to you, may be stored locally on the device using mechanisms such as browser web storage. Please consult your device or client documentation on how to manage such local storage.
- If you use location-enabled products and services, such as Google Maps for mobile, you may be sending us location information. This information may reveal your actual location, such as GPS data, or it may not, such as when you submit a partial address to look at a map of the area.
- If you use Google Latitude on a mobile device, in addition to other information, we collect battery life information and tie it to your Google Account.
- Certain of our products and services allow you to download and/or personalize the content you receive from us. For these products and services, we will record information about your downloads and preferences, along with any information you provide yourself (such as a list of your stocks to personalize your stock listings). If the product or service requires you to log in with a Google Account, this information will be associated with your Google Account.
- If you use Google to transcode, or format, non-mobile pages to display properly on your device, we need to send your request to Google's servers for formatting. That means that we will record these requests, which are generally for material beyond Google's sites.
- For products and services with voice recognition capabilities, we collect and store a copy of the voice input you make to the product or service and corrections you make to the returned recognition result. To improve processing of your voice input, we may also continuously record in temporary memory a few seconds of ambient background noise. This recording stays only temporarily on the device and is not sent to Google. If you choose to personalize voice recognition, we will associate your voice data with your Google Account.

Uses

- We use your information to process and personalize your requests. We also use the information for support, to develop new features, and to improve the overall quality of Google's products and services.
- We may also use the information to show you a history of your activity, to provide you with statistics about you or your use of our product or service, or to provide you with a better user experience.
- If you purchase something through Google's products and services, we may also use your information to bill you and to handle billing disputes.

How do we question the content of our true character in an age when our content is constantly being curated, edited, and bent by yourself and others.

essentially curating your life to what you desire to be - i believe in self affirmation but, I dont believe its who I am.

none of this truly exists in reality and there is a huge disconnected there that we all feel its a popularity contest, its based on a system of ratings, and the very idea of time is like an attempt to flatten out your life into a line, from birth "Born" Image facebook to " Death "

Flatline life , which is not flat, we learned that with Columbus - the world is ROUND

this self projection is not accurate and regresses human growth and dynamism your life memory dummed down and summed up to how good of a photographer the person you happen to be with is.

This preys on that part of human nature of personal insecurity, and acceptance.

It is important to question these corporations as to what is ' sensitive personal information ', how is it being collected, what is being done with it, and what are the profits.

Dont forget that if it doesn't make money it doesn't manifest in America

Question this because if we are going to exist in this state, most likely a percentage of our existence is on internet space. And some common foresight tells me soon we will have no choice nor should we fight this technological advancement. I believe in cybertronics

So I pondered, how does one keep self in computational realm of our era and at least if we are going to represent ourselves on the internet we should have the right to look the way want and not be jammed into a vertically challenged cascading style sheet.

I choose to lead by example, how do you?

#19: Shock the Puppy

When Stanley Milgram published the results of his obedience experiment in 1963, it sent shockwaves through the scientific community. Other researchers found it hard to believe that people could be so easily manipulated, and they searched for any mistakes Milgram might have made. Charles Sheridan and Richard King theorized that perhaps Milgram's subjects had merely played along with the experiment because they realized the victim was faking his cries of pain. To test this possibility, Sheridan and King decided to repeat Milgram's experiment, introducing one significant difference. Instead of using an actor, they would use an actual victim who would really get shocked. Obviously they couldn't use a human for this purpose, so they used the next best thing a cute, fluffy puppy.

Sheridan and King told their subjects volunteers from an undergraduate psychology course that the puppy was being trained to distinguish between a flickering and a steady light. It had to stand either to the right or the left depending on the cue from the light. If the animal failed to stand in the correct place, the subjects had to press a switch to shock it. As in the Milgram experiment, the shock level increased 15 volts for every wrong answer. But unlike the Milgram experiment, the puppy really was getting zapped.

As the voltage increased, the puppy first barked, then jumped up and down, and finally started howling with pain. The volunteers were horrified. They paced back and forth, hyperventilated, and gestured with their hands to show the puppy where to stand. Many openly wept. Yet the majority of them, twenty out of twenty-six, kept pushing the shock button right up to the maximum voltage.

Intriguingly, the six students who refused to go on were all men. All thirteen women who participated in the experiment obeyed right up until the end.
